

Have an Escape Route Planned

Before Stopping at a Red Light or Stop Sign.

Example of what not to do:

You're approaching a red light, there is a car in front of you. You roll up too close to the car and all the sudden you hear screeching behind you. You look in your mirror and see some dope in a cage yacking on a cell phone and not paying attention and braking hard to avoid hitting you in the rear. If you're too close to the cage in front of you, you will have no escape, you're out of luck because you're going to get rear ended, unless the fool behind you stops in time. I wouldn't want to play those odds.

ALWAYS leave at least a 6-foot gap between you and the cage in front of you so you can have an escape. When you stop and leave the 6-foot gap also look to both sides and decide which side is the safest route to take in the event you need to escape.

And remember...

Ride Safe & Have Fun... :)
